Their story:

EBTH was born out of a passion for antiques, a desire to change the way they're discovered, and a commitment to providing sellers with a better alternative for selling their property. In 2008, Jacquie Denny and Brian Graves posted the first estate sale of its kind to EBTH.com. As word of the new and unique service began to circulate, the phones started ringing...and they haven't stopped since. Today, EBTH sees an average of 50 – 60 sales per month and business continues to grow.

EBTH has shown themselves to be both passionate and innovative as they've grown their business. They say the smartest move so far has been to develop their own technology allowing them to automate processes that continue to slow traditional auctioneers and estate sale service providers. By continuing to innovate, EBTH performs services faster, offering both buyers and sellers a better experience.

Andy Nielsen, president and CEO of EBTH says, "Make sure you are incredibly passionate about the product or service you're delivering and can make others passionate about it as well. Passion helps recruit customers, talent, and partners – and it also gets you through the toughest days as an entrepreneur."

EBTH has plans to open up eight new markets in 2015 expanding their reach beyond the Midwest and increasing awareness on a much broader, national scale.
